Major Arcana: Judgement

During hurricane parties, beer foaming on the curb, we prepare for the inevitable return of glass bottom boats, trawl nets, and oil cans—all we’ve cast into the water.

Jade oak leaves quiver and clouds wing from the bay. It’s not unfamiliar to see bodies rolling in the water after flash floods. Clothed in tuxes and paisley dresses, it’s as if they’d brazenly decided to swim. If you stared long enough they would stand tall and flat like the horizon’s oil rigs. Instead they rest in slick loam

beside bricks and shattered cedar, dreaming of moss
on cypress knees.